Business Leadership

"Performance Management - A necessary evil?"

Human nature often dictates that we don't like to be measured, there can be fear of conflict and we often feel uncomfortable about giving and receiving feedback. This combined with an onerous weight of a form trail weighs heavy upon our shoulders.

When done well, a performance review should facilitate a quality discussion reviewing the individual's past performance, setting goals for the year ahead, and form the basis for making development and improvement plans.

In today's economic environment, ensuring everyone is performing at their highest level becomes even more imperative.

We look at the potential benefits of the process and how to minimise the pain.

Behaviour We Don't Want to Repeat!

If anything underpins the importance of behaviours on the effectiveness of business we need only to look at recent events which have sent the Global Economy into decline.

If we look at how we got to this stage it is clear that the way in which some business leaders have acted or behaved have contributed to a large extent to the position we now find ourselves in - so let us have a look at what those behaviours have been and why going forward we must make sure that they are not repeated.
